The sudden surge in violence follows last week's announcement by the NLD party, led by State Counsellor Aung San Suu Kyi, that her party would not contest the 2010 general elections. While the NLD party has recently won a few by-elections in remote areas of the country, where voter turnout is typically low, and Suu Kyi has played a prominent role in rallying anti-government dissent, the party was already struggling to win public support before its most recent decision to boycott the polls. The timing of Suu Kyi's announcement – she had pledged to hold off on the announcement until after the November 16th general election – came as a surprise to many observers. While the party could still contest by-elections, the decision means it will not be eligible to be a member of parliament following the conclusion of the 2010 polls. It has been suggested that the NLD's decision is in part a reaction to the recent tense atmosphere since the dissolution of parliament by the ruling Military League in June.
